

Do I Need a Will?

A will is a legal document that sets forth your wishes for your property and dependents after your death.

State law determines who will inherit your estate should you die without a will. If your preferences as to whom you want to inherit your estate match these laws, you may not require a will.

Who May Not Require a Will?

If you are single without children and you intend for your parents to inherit your estate, then you may not need a will. If you are married, do not own significant separate property, and you intend for your spouse to inherit all community property, then you may not need a will.

Who May Require a Will?

If your preferences for whom you would like to inherit your estate do not match relevant state law, you may need a will. If you would like to designate a guardian for your children and/or designate how and when your children can inherit your estate, you may need a will.

If you would like to request a will or other estate planning services, please use the QR codes below to schedule an appointment. If this is for a deployment or mobilization, please make note of that in the subject line of your email.

Schedule an appointment in 2 easy steps:
