Post announces updated gate hours

By ROBERT TIMMONS
Fort Jackson Public Affairs

Drivers coming on post June 3 will find it a little easier to enter the installation made some changes to its access control point hours.

The adjusted hours “actually opens the gates a little earlier,” said Col. Timothy Hickman, garrison commander during the retiree breakfast, May 16 as part of Retiree Appreciation Days.

“Those of you who work over by the 81st (Readiness Division) or perhaps by the (Military Entrance Processing Station off Marion Avenue) will see more consistent times and more predictable times so we can get people on and off here as fast as we can” in a most efficient way “without bankrupting ourselves over hiring gate guards.”

The post would like to open the gates even longer, but “fiscal realities,” as Hickman called them, precludes the post from doing so.

These realities come from the Army stating the post should only operate gates 2 and 4 due to the amount of traffic entering the installation each day.

“We know that that is absolutely not the case,” Hickman said. “Can you imagine all those cars coming through today through Gate 2? Right, so we collectively Fort Jackson decided to operate one extra Gate 1 and then Gate 5 because we acknowledge so much growth happening” in the surrounding community.

Fort Jackson guards scan all identification cards in a car as part of the post’s plan to convince the Army to fund another gate.

“The scans are what the Army’s using to calculate how many guards you need,” Hickman said. “So, if we only do one scan we are doing only a quarter of the people who come on post.

“So that’s why we are pretty persistent about scanning everybody in the car, so we can show them how many people come here.”

Remembering their service on Memorial Day

By ROBERT TIMMONS

Fort Jackson Public Affairs

A one-mile run, 100 pullups, 200 pushups, 300 air squats and another mile run.

That was a routine workout for Navy Lt. Michael Murphy, Medal of Honor recipient killed in action in Afghanistan.

It is also a workout held in his honor each Memorial Day. The May 23 event was one of two Memorial Day events involving Fort Jackson but was the only one held on post.

The other was held May 27 at the Fort Jackson National Cemetery in Columbia.

Maj. Gen. Jason E. Kelly, Fort Jackson commander, laid a wreath at the cemetery and said afterwards the day was a way “to vocalize that we have not forgotten the why of this day.”

“Memorial Day is super important,” said Col. David Uthlaut, 165th Infantry Brigade commander before the Murph Challenge. “If you think about the history of Memorial Day, it really goes back to the Civil War with a lot of fallen Americans on our own soil. A lot of family members took the opportunity once a year to recognize what used to be called Decoration Day.”

Memorial Day recognizes those who have fallen in all wars and have given “that sacrifice,” he said.

“That’s something special about this country and something special about the military ... is that we are going to ask a lot of you. We are going to ask a lot of you in peace time and we’re certainly going to ask a lot of you, up to giving your own life in combat.”

Kelly said that as people reflect about the day he didn’t want them to “forget the why of this day. I want them to know (service members’) sacrifices were not in vain because the American way of life, the freedoms that we enjoy have been safeguarded by the sacrifices of their loved ones.”

According to the Navy.mil, Murphy gave his life, June 28, 2005, during Operation Red Wings as he fearlessly exposed himself to enemy fire in order to call for support during a heated firefight with the Taliban high in the Hindu Kush mountains.

“Despite the intensity of the firefight and suffering grave gunshot wounds himself, Murphy is credited with risking his own life to save the lives of his teammates,” the Navy’s Medal of Honor site stated. “Murphy, intent on making contact with headquarters, but realizing this would be impossible in the extreme terrain where they were fighting, unhesitatingly and with complete disregard for his own life moved into the open, where he could gain a better position to transmit a call to get help for his men.”

Basic Combat Training Museum

The 100th Infantry Division was activated at Fort Jackson for World War II on Nov. 15, 1942. While the building boom on post was in full swing at that point, the departure of the 30th Division the month before freed up much needed training space. Nicknamed the Century Division, as a new division the 100th would undergo intensive and innovative training during their year here prior to deployment to Europe.

Basic Combat Training in World War II consisted of 13 weeks of close order drill, obstacle courses, weapons marksmanship, and hiking (their term) long miles which remain standard today. By 1943, the need for more realistic training in anticipation of combat in the European Theater of Operations resulted in several innovations. At Camp Jackson during World War I, engineers built a series of replica trenches to acclimate and prepare green troops for combat. This was a novel idea and this first use of immersive environments in basic combat training proved effective.

The use of recreated combat conditions to augment basic training was expanded at Fort Jackson during World War II. The Century Division's 325th Combat Battalion constructed a new infiltration course, complete with machine guns that fired over the crawling trainees' heads, and a mock Nazi village. The village was designed to, "...subject the trainee to every sight, sound, and sensation of battle" necessary for urban warfare training according to historian Michael Bass. Efforts went so far as outfitting some Soldiers in captured Afrika Corps uniforms to familiarize trainees with the German uniform's rank and unit designations.

With the best training possible behind them, the 100th arrived at the ETO on Oct. 20, 1944, after which it fought for 185 continuous days of combat. Their record included the Ardennes-Alsace, Rhineland, and Central Europe campaigns. During the capture of the French towns Lemberg and Bitche, the time spent training at Fort Jackson's simulated village likely paid dividends during the intense house-to-house fighting.

The success of the 100th Infantry Division during World War II came at a high price.

Casualties included 883 killed in action, 3,539 wounded in action, 483 missing in action, and 491 prisoners of war. Today the 100th continues as the 100th Training Division (Leader Development) stationed at Fort Knox.

New talent acquisition class begins on post

By CHRISTOPHER HURD
Army News Service

The Army's recruiting transformation is underway as the first group of warrant officers are currently going through the talent acquisition technician training course.

Once they graduate, these Soldiers will provide the Army with a voluntary group of permanent and skilled talent acquisition technicians.

"We see this as a major shift in transforming our future recruiting force by selecting Soldiers that want to do this," said Col. Christine Rice, officer in charge of the Army's workforce redesign initiative. "If we have a force made up of permanent recruiters, we can focus on training them to the next level to be able to accomplish their duties."

The class of 25 warrant officers finished the first two weeks of fundamental data analytics training last week at the Adjutant General School at Fort Jackson. They are now at the Recruiting and Retention College at Fort Knox, Kentucky for eight weeks of technical training. There, they'll learn about recruiting operations, marketing, public affairs and how to use data analytics for recruiting.

Army senior leaders decided to create this new career field, along with an enlisted talent acquisition specialist MOS, when they announced changes to the recruiting enterprise last fall.

Since that time, a team from the U.S. Army Recruiting Command, the Adjutant General School and the Recruiting and Retention College have been working with industry and academic partners to create this unique course.

'The Weigh It Is' with Pam Long

Yes, we need protein, yes, we need carbohydrates and yes, we need fats. We are created to need each of these macronutrients, so we must remember that fat, just like the other macronutrients, plays a vital role in healthy living. Fats not only store energy, but it shields our vital organs. It is how fat-soluble vitamins are absorbed.

As it relates to eating, fat tastes great, but because it is so delicious and potent (nine calories per gram), we only need a little, so moderation is a must. Eating fat in large amounts is a recipe for failure when it comes to dieting. It makes us sluggish, heavier and increases our chances of potential health problems.

Health wise, people should eat about 55 to 60 grams of fat daily.

Again, I will remind you that fat is a macronutrient. It has calories. Each gram of fat equals nine calories.

That is a lot of energy compared to protein and carbohydrates, which have four calories per gram. However, if you are not using that energy, then you are storing those extra calories. That can really add up before you know it.

We don't give it enough credit because we get caught up in how fat makes us fat, but fat does have a positive side to our health.

Firstly, fats help us absorb vitamins A, D, E, and K, our bodies absorb these vitamins more efficiently when we consume them along with fat (preferably healthy fats). Because fats provide the structure of the outer membrane of the cells in our bodies, it supports cell growth. Fat helps with wound healing, hormone production, our brain, and eye health.

To stay on the healthy side of fat, we need to know which fats are safe and which ones we need to avoid whenever possible. There are several types of fats that fall into two categories ... bad fats and good fats.

Each has a different effect on your health.

When you think about bad fats, normally they are usually identified as Trans-fat and Saturated fat. When vegetable oil goes through a process called hydrogenation, that is how trans fats are made. During the process, the oil hardens to create hard fats. Trans fats increase bad cholesterol and lower good cholesterol levels. Now for the bad news ... common sources of bad fats are fried foods, cakes, cookies, pies, pastries, biscuits, donuts, ... you get the picture.

Saturated fat, just like trans-fat, increases bad cholesterol which could lead to heart disease. When you think about these types of bad fats, they include fatty meat, dairy products that contain high fat, creamy sauces like Alfredo sauce and processed meats to name a few.

I mentioned earlier, there are bad fats, but there are good fats too, and they can affect our health in very positive ways. Fats like polyunsaturated and monounsaturated are examples of good fats.

They help reduce bad cholesterol in the body to help keep it healthy. Good fats like polyunsaturated reduce the risk of blood clotting and decrease the risk of heart problems. Foods rich in Omega-3 are polyunsaturated and include foods like mackerel, salmon, walnuts, and canola oil to name a few. Monounsaturated fat also reduces bad cholesterol in the body. Foods rich in monounsaturated fat are nuts, peanut oils, and olive oils.

Knowing the different types of fats helps us make wiser decisions when it comes to a healthier, more balanced diet.

Strive to eat foods high in fat in moderation. This includes good fats, and bad fats because even healthier fats, when consumed excessively, can cause weight challenges, and impact your overall health.

Pam's thought for the week:
"Food, like your money should be working for you."

"It's been a tremendous undertaking for those training and education developers," said Zenon Zacharyj, chief of faculty and staff at the Recruiting and Retention College. "It's (been) a lot of work and a lot of passion. We've got an amazing team."

They built a training program across two locations with over 75 lessons from scratch in just a few months.

The course teaches students how to leverage technology, social media, artificial intelligence and other tools to connect with potential recruits. The first class is scheduled to graduate in July.

These new talent acquisition technicians will go on to various recruiting units to serve as mentors, trainers and technical experts.

"I'm proud of what everybody has done to this point and I'm very honored because the (Army's) senior leaders have placed this trust into our warrant officers," said Chief Warrant Officer 5 Chad Bowen, chief warrant officer of the Adjutant General Corps. "A warrant officer in the Army is someone who is specifically trained to perform at the next level and this course is going to help develop that."

The next two groups of Soldiers to attend the training will follow a slightly different path. They are noncommissioned officers who must first attend warrant officer candidate school before going to the Adjutant General School for four weeks. It will take these Soldiers 17 weeks before they are fully trained talent acquisition technicians.

After the first three classes, developers will analyze feedback and adjust the curriculum.

The Army selected these Soldiers based on past performance and attributes they displayed that best fit the talent acquisition career field.

The process is like the one used for special forces and was designed through a partnership with the recruiting command, the Army Research Institute and the Office of the Command Psychologist.

The enlisted talent acquisition specialist course is still being developed and the team plans to use what they learned from this course to help shape that curriculum.

Event aims at increasing domestic violence awareness

ROBERT TIMMONS
Fort Jackson Public Affairs

“Here at Fort Jackson, we are creating a community where domestic violence, child abuse survivors are supported and where people have an opportunity to thrive without fear of violence or abuse,” said Garrison Command Sgt. Maj. Brie Kotula.

Fort Jackson’s Army Community Service led a collaborative effort to educate the community about domestic violence, May 23.

Many on-post and local partners spoke during the first Heroes for Harmony Workshop held at the 1917 Club. These included on-post entities ACS Financial Readiness, Family Advocacy Program, military police, and the Office of the Staff Judge Advocate.

Off-post organizations speaking at the event included the Richland County Coroner, City of Columbia Police Department, and the 5th Circuit Solicitor’s Office.

Kotula said forging civilians into Soldiers produces “the strongest forces in the world,” but there is a byproduct of that process – stress.

“As with great endeavors, stress comes,” she said opening the workshop. “Families are called upon to support their Soldiers in a fast-paced process ... relationships are put to the test. No relationship is perfect, but it is important to recognize the warning signs of abuse because abuse impedes the mission.”

Catherine Ross, chief clinical and educational officer with Sister Care, said the workshop was “very important” because “we’re still discussing a very important woman’s justice, human rights, public health issue that is intimate partner violence.”

She said that IPV differs from domestic violence in that it includes those who are dating.

Ross said national statistics show that IPV is the top health risk for women and that one of every three women will be abused.

According to the National Coalition Against Domestic Violence, 42.3% of South Carolinian women and 29.2% of South Carolinian men experience intimate partner physical violence, intimate partner sexual violence, and/or intimate partner stalking in their lifetimes. In 2019, 36 women and six men were victims of domestic violence homicide with 78.5% of these committed with firearms.

There are many ways Fort Jackson supports domestic violence victims.

The Family Advocacy Program helps Soldiers and Families recognize and meet the unique challenges of military lifestyles. Our services include seminars, workshops, counseling, and intervention to help strengthen Army Families, enhance resiliency and relationship skills, and improve quality of life.

The program has additional programs such as transitional compensation program for abused dependents and the Victim Advocacy Program.

The 120th Adjutant General Battalion reaffirmed its commitment to Soldiers’ safety by conducting its annual SHARP 5K Walk/Run.

Soldiers, civilians, and contractors assigned to the unit gathered at the Battalion track where they heard opening remarks rendered from Lt. Col. Scotty Boler, 120th commander.

“I want to thank you all for showing up and participating in today’s event,” Boler said. “Today is a special day because together, we reaffirm our commitment to take on sexual assault and sexual harassment and eliminate them from our ranks.”

Participants wore teal shirts to show support for sexual assault survivors.

They took to the streets with signs that displayed positive messages about prevention, awareness, and trust for the Army SHARP Program.

The Army’s Sexual Harassment/Assault Response and Prevention program exists so the Army can prevent sexual harassment and sexual assaults before they occur.

After completing the 5K, participants signed their new battalion pledge based on the Army’s I. A.M. STRONG Campaign. The campaign vows to combat sexual assaults and harassment by encouraging soldiers to prevent incidents before they occur by intervening, acting, and being motivated to protect fellow service members.

“Today was amazing, and our goal is to let you all know how invaluable you are to our team,” said Command Sgt. Maj. Sierra Aquaowo, 120th’s senior enlisted leader.

“For us to remain a high-functioning team, we must eradicate behaviors that erode trust and cohesion within our formation,” Aquaowo said. “Sexual assault or harassment will not be tolerated, and I encourage you all to continue to speak up, speak out, and support one another.”

The unit concluded the event with a prayer and moment of silence rendered by Sgt. Randall Foster, the battalion religious Support noncommissioned officer.

“May God continue to bless our formation and forge a hedge of protection around the beloved Warrior Soldiers and Civilians here with us today,” Foster said as attendees bowed their heads, closed their eyes, and held hands in solidarity.
